Next generation

We don't need a study to tell us that women are very curious about each other's lives. We often assume our friends and colleagues have it all figured out-at home, at work, in their own skin. This month, we present the fascinating results of our second annual survey of Canadian women ("This is 40ish," page 64), in which we asked more than 1,000 women from coast to coast to tell us how they really feel about love, sex, work, money, health, aging and (because we're nosy) their preferred style of underwear. They're the kind of questions you'd ask if polite society weren't a major consideration: What's the worst thing you do as a parent? When do you lie about money? How often do you fantasize about quitting your job? It turns out that a lot of us suspect other people are having more fun, more sex and more fulfilling relationships than we are - and, okay, some people actually are. But there's serious comfort in knowing that everyone else is worrying about it too.

For almost 90 years, Chatelaine has served to connect Canadian women through personal storytelling and shared experience. With each new generation, the magazine has evolved to reflect the tone, style and, of course, recipes of the times (these days, for instance, we rarely use gelatin moulds). This year, we're evolving again. Beginning with the March 2017 issue, the print edition of Chatelaine will be going bimonthly (so instead of producing 12 issues a year, we're making six). Our magazine will continue to be an essential part of what we do. At the same time, as culture and technologies continue to shift and our readers migrate to new platforms in droves, we're increasing our commitment to digital storytelling in its myriad forms and to the real-time conversations it allows for.

In 2017, there have never been more ways to engage with Chatelaine, whether it's through our dynamic daily app (available on Android and iTunes), our intimate UpTalk podcast (find it on our website) or via our curated newsletters, delivered straight to your inbox each morning. Plus, you can find us 24/7 on our social feeds: Follow us on Facebook, Twitter, Pinterest, Instagram and YouTube for the latest Chatelaine stories, recipes, videos and more. To our loyal print subscribers, our commitment to producing a gorgeous, ideaspacked magazine is as strong as ever and we're grateful for your continued support-our next issue will be in your mailbox before you know it. Until then, don't be a stranger.

FIRST THING

Lace up and go

The key to surviving a Canadian winter is to get outside, preferably on two blades. The country has some majestic skating trails, like the one at Arrowhead Provincial Park in Muskoka, Ont., which winds through 1.5 km of snow-dappled trees. And if the après part is more your thing, sip a hot toddy in a cozy lodge: The Fairmont Chateau Lake Louise, overlooking the lake's emerald expanse, is spectacular.

Arrowhead Provincial Park is open for the winter season Dec. 9-March 27, ontarioparks.com/park/arrowhead.

Ausma Khan

This human rights lawyer turned author and activist is untangling East-West relations one crime novel at a time By KATIE UNDERWOOD n troubled times, art flourishes-whether as a necessary outlet or simply as a way to beat back the existential ennui. Given the undercurrent of xenophobia in today's political climate, some may think it's frivolous to pour sweat into a crime novel. Ausma Khan disagrees.

Born in Leicester, England, to Pakistani parents, Khan had a childhood shaped in part by the swirling racial tensions in the England of the early '70s. Concerned about the well-being of his four Muslim children, Khan's father moved the family to the Canadian prairies, and later Toronto, in the name of opportunity. A bookish kid, Khan immersed herself in the sci-fi series Dune and dreamed of writing her own novel. "It was so appealing to me because the novel relies heavily on Islamic mythology," says Khan. "Its history and symbols were presented in a very life-affirming and magical and powerful way that I hadn't seen before." But, she says, her "traditional" South Asian family values took precedence over her clandestine dream: She pursued a PhD in international human rights law and went on to practise law and teach it at both Northwestern and York Universities. She also served as the editor-inchief of Muslim Girl, a magazine geared toward a young, female audience that Khan says "represented the real Canadian Islam." But when the magazine closed in 2008, Khan finally sat down to write a trilogy of crime novels.

The Unquiet Dead (published in 2015, when Khan was 46), The Language of Secrets and her latest, out this month, Among the Ruins, follow Inspector Esa Khattak, a Toronto-based Muslim cop who handles "minority-sensitive" cases in the city's community policing division. For all of its fictional plot points, Khan's series tackles very real issues: Islamophobia, war crimes and the fraught relationship between law enforcement and the Muslim community.

Khan says Ruins, which situates Khattak overseas in Iran, is a "good parallel to what's happening in the United States," where she lives with her husband, a professor. "People are building walls and retreating into insular identities," she says. "I'm putting Esa in a setting where he has to learn somebody else's way of doing things." Marrying advocacy, law, education and art comes naturally to Khan. "I've always tried to represent marginalized voices," she says. "If I can craft something with a message of hope and belonging and common humanity, the work I do is activism. For me, there is no distinction." @

You've confused her with

North Stars

A-list performers of blockbuster pop hits have become one of Canada's greatest natural resources (take that, wood and fur). There's indie spirit Alessia Cara, boy next door Shawn Mendes and wannabe bad boy the Weeknd. But it's the bros with braggadocio and bruised hearts-Justin Bieber and Drake-who are ruling the international stage. This year, the Biebs landed four Grammy nods and the self-dubbed 6 God snagged eight.

Three's company

In Big Little Lies, a blockbuster HBO miniseries from Ally McBeal titan David E. Kelley, three moms (played by powerhouse trio Nicole Kidman, Reese Witherspoon and Shailene Woodley) commiserate over the toxic dynamics and secret shames they keep behind closed doors. Dark laughs ensue.

Premieres Feb. 19.

THEATRE Good Samaritans

On September 11, 2001, 38 planes descended on Gander, N.L. The small town rallied to feed and house the wayfarers, offering a sense of community in the midst of chaos. Those events inspired Come from Away, a delightful 2015 musical that opens on Broadway (in previews) this month. Opens Feb. 18.

Literary superstar Zadie Smith on race, class and Prince Harry's new relationship Teeth-a sprawling, boisterous snapshot of multicultural London in the early aughts. She now teaches creative writing at New York University and recently released her fifth novel, Swing Time. The book follows an unnamed narrator who grows up in working-class London with her Jamaican mother and British father. She immerses herself in dance but never breaks through. Instead, she enters the bizarre world of celebrity by becoming a personal assistant to an Aussie pop diva. As always, Smith brings her observational style to heavy themes, like the confines of class, race and belonging, and toxic friendships. Chatelaine spoke with Smith about raising girls, being thoughtful in the era of hot takes and what she considers her greatest achievement.

Your new book focuses on two girls growing up in London in the 1980s, when you came of age, and you have a daughter now. What's harder and what's easier about raising girls these days? I do notice a kind of rigidity about gender now. The little girls I know don't touch something if it's not pink; they want to know first if it's meant for them or meant for boys. Kids just seem to be aware of their gender incredibly early, with lots of depressing side effects, like "I don't want to play that game because it's not a girls' game," or "I don't want that toy because it's not a girls' toy."

In a recent Vanity Fair piece, you said your greatest accomplishment was getting into Cambridge, but you published your first novel at just 24 years old. I thought that would be your biggest coup. Going to university was the least likely thing to happen to me, and it was the hardest thing. Everything followed once I got into university: I could learn to write, learn to read, meet publishers. That's all gravy afterwards. The gap is trying to get to a place where any of this stuff could possibly happen. I worked so hard to get into university, it almost killed me. Now, I teach at NYU, so I'm completely aware of kids who think going to university is as natural as getting up in the morning. From the moment they were born, they were going to go, and once they are there, they almost have contempt for the process. But that's a different kind of life.

I wish I had read all your books as a teenager, so I could see myself reflected in literature. Why is it so important to see yourself in culture? I used to kick against that slightly sentimental idea of literature, because I thought it was a kind of ghettoization-that we're going to write books only as role models for readers. But, as I've grown older, I've recognized how important it was to me. I've just read Homegoing, by a girl who is almost half my age [Yaa Gyasi], and my first thought was exactly as you say, "I wish I'd had this book when I was 15. I wish somebody had written a novel about slavery and what followed in a way that I could understand."

You've portrayed complex characters of many races since the beginning of your career. But recently race has become a trendy subject on social media and in the press. Are you concerned that the media is co-opting identity politics for clicks? Part of the interest in identity politics is that people are hoping to find an ethical position from which they can be superior. I think of my brothers on the street when they were young: If white women are going to cross the street to avoid you, you end up playing that role because it's a kind of power. If people are going to be scared of you because of the way you wear your jeans or your hooded top, it's something; it's better than nothing.

A lot of the fierce policing people are doing online is about that-about feeling like "I am a black woman and so, at this moment in history, I have this moral authority and I'm going to use it." I don't blame them, but I am not part of that. I am a black woman, but I'm not someone who feels any authority from that position. I don't really believe in the authority of a personal identity-I believe only in action, good and bad. I see people battling each other, knocking each other's privileges down. I'm more interested in the questions of structural inequality than in "my personal identity is more blameless than yours." I don't think you can get very far on that ticket.

What is the biggest challenge of being a literary writer in the digital era when everyone's rushing to write hot takes? I think of myself as a slow food movement in prose; if somebody asks me to write 2,000 words on someone who died at 4 p.m., I just don't. I might write it three months later, if I feel like it. That's all I do, deciding to take time and care with what I write and seeing how that goes. People aren't able to read as they used to. I've noticed it more and more in the past 10 years. If someone puts an article of mine online, it's more than possible that 40 percent of people who read the article get exactly the wrong end of the stick.

Prince Harry recently put out a statement about the media's treatment of his girlfriend, American actor Meghan Markle, whose mother is African American. What does it mean to you, if anything? When I was a kid, my mom and I would dream of Prince William having a black girlfriend. I don't know why. I'm way too old to care, but it did send me back to being a small child. So I'm sure some kid somewhere is happy about it. I saw only a vague headline that the British press had responded very negatively to this brown girl. And he always dated blonds exclusively. It's a funny thing.

Harry went after the press for the racial undertones of the coverage. I don't know much about the royal family, but among the young, Harry has always been the one that everybody liked because he's fun, he likes hip-hop and he's badly behaved at times. And somehow he looks posh but also like a boy off the street. So I'm sure it'll confirm what people suspected: that he is one of the people.

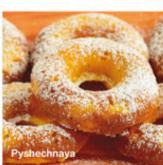

Your novels resonate with so many people, in part, because you write from experience. You don't bang readers over the head with a larger message. There's also the thing about wanting to be liked, which is very strong in culture. When my friend Lena Dunham made Girls, my students were horrified by it. They couldn't understand why a woman wouldn't make the best of herself at all times. I feel a lot of kinship with Lena for that reason. The purpose of a novel shouldn't be to show how clever and witty Zadie Smith is. A lot of writers write with that intention. I'm not trying to make anybody like me. I'm just trying to write life as I see it. @ and otherworldly relationship between Rachel, daughter of a Russian family living in London, and Zachariah, their adopted son. "The history and culture of Russia holds endless fascination for me," Richler says. "It's an epic landscape ... a gift for the writer." - Danielle Groen

Charcoal deodorant

Dominique Lamberton, associate editor

The backstory

This 99 percent natural stick (which goes on clear) is a charcoalbased deodorant that claims to draw out built-up toxins and bacteria from your underarms. The detox process takes 30 days, and you'll smell worse before you smell better.

The day-to-day

> Flu face: When your nose is red, your eyes are swollen, your lips are chapped, and all you want to do is hide

Weeks 1 to 3 were smooth sailing, I was virtually odourless, and pretty dry too. And then bam. In week 4 a particularly strong odour developed in my left underarm. I started reapplying multiple times a day, and sometimes it didn't even mask the smell fully.

The result

My body odour has levelled out. I still keep the mini stick handy at work, but I'm not getting hit by unexpected whiffs anymore. Listen, nothing beats antiperspirant (and for big events, I'll reach for it again), but the 30 days made me commit to trying a natural deodorant and gave my body time to adjust to it.

Collagen is a protein found in our skin. It forms the basic structure that keeps your skin thick, elastic and smooth. The more you have, the younger you look. Unfortunately, after the age of 25, we lose collagen fast, the skin gets thinner, and eventually starts to sag. Collagen supplements have become popular, but even with some promising studies, there is still doubt about how much our skin benefits, as the digestive breakdown of collagen gets in the way.

THE COLLAGEN BUILDING SOLUTION

While topical solutions can provide moisture, they rarely reach deep dermal layers, where the collagen is needed. The solution is to stimulate and boost the skin's owns production of collagen, which scientist are finding can be done with some specific ingredients, especially from fruits.

Tomatoes, pomegranate and algae is where we find the most powerful ingredients for boosting collagen formation in the skin. New Nordic has designed a product called Skin Care Collagen™, which concentrates high amounts of these critical ingredients and further adds protective antioxidants and type 1 collagen.

The tablet has been proven to promote both a significant reduction of fine lines as well as an increase in elasticity and hydration.

Maya was shocked by the change in her hair. Fullness and volume were replaced by thinness and lifeless hair. She had to do something.

I PANICKED -MY HAIR WAS THINNING!

"The hair I found in my brush, in the shower and on my cardigan was unfamiliar to me. It was thinning like never before. How could this be happening?

One look at a Diego Rivera mural or the interior of a house designed by architect Luis Barragán, and you see a complex love affair with colour, Warm and cool shades often mingle side by side, and there's no such thing as a neutral interior.

Ceramics

The production of ceramics in Mexico dates back thousands of years. The pottery ranges in colour from traditional terracotta to a silvery charcoal called barro negro, made in the Oaxaca region.

The ongoing trend of handmade products means it's easy to find sculptural ceramics to add to your home. Concrete

In 1968, Mexico City hosted the Summer Olympics, which set off a host of new building projects. Architects at the time favoured modern concrete construction. The look continues to influence contemporary designers.

ACCEPT THE TRUTH ABOUT SEX AFTER 40

"Netflix and chill" isn't a euphemism

If life is busy and your biggest desire is to curl up, fully clothed, with your partner and The Crown, cut yourself some slack. It doesn't mean your sex life is over - in fact, some quiet time can help foster intimacy, says Robin Milhausen, associate professor in the Department of Family Relations at the University of Guelph. Just keep your partner in the loop with how you're feeling.

RIP, rose petals on the bed

Chances are grand romantic gestures are a thing of the past - and that's okay. Shake things up by "making out in the laundry room," says Milhausen. And if you're short on time, don't shortchange manual stimulation.

"Touching your partner, and having your partner touch you, is very pleasurable and often climax comes quickly!"

It's not all downhill from here

Some women find that desire increases as they age, Milhausen says. Feeling comfortable in your own body and knowing what you like means you can leave the insecurities of your youth behind.

[LESSON 02]

Get to know your lubes

There are a few reasons you may feel a little on the dry side as you get older: hormonal fluctuation, dehydration - or maybe your body has always been this way! Whatever the reason (or occasion), adding lube can lead to a feel-good time. Kristen Gilbert, director of education at B.C.'s Options for Sexual Health, says "the idea is to make lube a part of sex play, rather than applying it in a clinical, 'time to get ready' way." Silicone-based lubes stay slippery for longer and have a more "sensual" feel, Gilbert says, but they are far from the only option.

1. Organic

Gilbert says there's no obvious advantage to choosing organic. It comes down to personal preference. Good Clean Love Almost Naked organic personal lubricant, $17. goodcleanlove.com.

2. Warming

These are "worth a test drive," but if you're prone to reactions down there, exercise caution. Durex Play Warmer lubricant, $13. shoppersdrugmart.ca.

3. Oil-based

Experience dryness outside of sexy time? Oil lubes can soothe the labia and clitoris. During sexy time. however, don't use them with a condom, as they degrade latex. Province Apothecary sex oil, $28. provinceapothecary.ca.

4. Water-based

This type washes off easily but tends to get a little sticky during extended sessions. To remedy this, just add water. Sliquid H2O natural intimate lubricant, $25, well.ca.

Condoms are different now!

Back in the land of condoms? Fear not: They've come a long way since our high school days. Look for non-latex products made from polyisoprene and polyurethane, says Gilbert - they are warm to the touch, thin and stretchy, allowing for more sensation. Lelo's Hex has been called the "condom of the future"; the company claims its honeycomb structure makes for a more flexible product that is less likely to tear.

Q: There are times during the day when I can feel my heart beating irregularly, but everything else seems normal. Should I be worried?

Palpitations are an extremely common concern among women, particularly those under the age of 40 and those in perimenopause and menopause. They are a symptom, not a diagnosis: an awareness of your heartbeat, or a perception that your heart is beating in a way that feels unusual. There are serious problems that can cause palpitations, but other explanations are totally benign. In most cases, we never find a cause (and nearly all such cases are not dangerous).

The bigger things we worry about with palpitations are structural problems or electrical problems of the heart, called arrhythmias. Serious arrhythmias will usually cause not just the sensation of irregular heartbeats but other symptoms too-particularly dizziness or fainting. Some palpitations are caused by other, more systemic issues such as thyroid problems or anemia, both of which are common in women. Some people who experience palpitations may be diagnosed with anxiety or panic disorder.

Benign palpitations can often be attributed to risk factors you can do something about. Caffeine and alcohol can be triggers, as can fatigue. Palpitations can also be worse at different times in the menstrual cycle, and they are a side effect of some common medications, including asthma puffers, as well as certain cold and flu medication.

To sort out what's what. a health care provider will start by taking a thorough history and physical exam. A symptom diary can be a great help. Record details like when and where you get the palpitations; what you're doing when they come on; what they feel like; whether you get dizzy; whether you have to stop what you're doing; and how long they last. If you're able to take your own pulse and count the number of beats per minute, that's helpful too.

This information, combined with a physical exam, can be used to determine what investigations, if any, are needed. If you're having other symptoms, like sweating and weight loss, then you probably should have your thyroid checked. If you're fainting, you definitely need to undergo some tests, and your provider might suggest a cardiology referral.

When it comes to a common symptom like palpitations, we need to walk the line between not wanting to over-investigate with unnecessary tests and procedures, and not wanting to be dismissive. That's a difficult thing to do, and something that a doctor and patient have to work through together.

CAN GETTING PREGNANT IN THE WINTER INCREASE YOUR RISK OF DIABETES?

The research

A five-year study of more than 60,000 births in South Australia, published in BMJ Open Diabetes Research & Care found that women who conceived in winter were more likely to develop gestational diabetes than those who conceived in summer.

The caveat

Researchers looked at meteorological factors, physical activity, diet and intake of vitamin D to try to determine the cause, but the results were unclear. There were also risk factors that could have been collected, says Hope Weiler, a professor at McGill University who holds the Canada Research Chair in Nutrition and Health. "It would be good to know about the weight gain during pregnancy and if it was within the recommended amount," Weiler says.

The take-away

The causes may be unclear, but this study confirms a longsuspected correlation between season and gestational diabetes. Doctors recommend an active lifestyle, balanced diet and maintaining recommended vitamin D levels before conceiving and during pregnancy, and regardless of the season. -Diana Duong QEFENCE MECHANISMS 101 >> PROJECTION When you choose to deal with intolerable feelings by attributing them to others.

arianne French barely remembers how she got from Red Deer, Alta., to her home in Airdrie, Alta., that night. She knows she pulled over at a gas station to clean the inside of her car and that she stopped on the shoulder to listen to a few songs on the stereo. She recalls that she was sipping from a mickey of vodka, and that she was sometimes driving at high speeds. But French doesn't remember arriving at her home at 4:45 a.m.-eight hours after starting what is typically a 55-minute drive-with a gash in her arm and blood dripping onto her doorstep. Her partner, who spent hours that night worrying and wondering where she was, filled her in on the details after she recovered.

"I didn't care if I lived or died," French says of that dark time, when she was battling post-traumatic stress disorder rooted in the abuse she experienced as a child. On the days her children weren't around, she barely had the strength to climb out of bed.

That night was a tipping point: After years of suffering, French finally sought out a psychotherapist, who's helped her address suppressed memories, change painful patterns of behaviour and return to her job as a commercial painter. In many ways, it was a life-saving medical treatment-but one not covered by a public health care plan. "It's absolutely worth it," French says of the $130-perhour sessions. "But we're in debt up to our eyeballs because of it."

According to the Mental Health Commission of Canada, one in five Canadians will face a mental health issue this year.

(Chatelaine's own survey of approximately 1,000 Canadian women aged 35-45 found that 34 percent have been officially diagnosed with depression or anxiety.) But despite mounting evidence that psychotherapy-the practice of treating mental illness or distress through intensive conversations-is an effective treatment for trauma, anxiety and depression, it's not covered under any provincial health plan, and most employee benefits plans still include restrictive caps on how much a person can claim, and only for certain types of treatment.

The result, says Dr. Patrick Smith, a clinical psychologist and national CEO of the Canadian Mental Health Association (CMHA), is that people in crisis are often left sitting on long waiting lists for subsidized spots in small-scale programs, forced to pay out of pocket, like French, or never receive care at all. "Therapy is universally recognized as a gold standard of mental health care," he says. "And it's mostly unavailable in Canadaunless you can pay for it."

Indeed, only one in three people who have suffered a mental health issue report having received treatment, according to Statistics Canada figures from 2003. And the effects are wide-reaching: A 2011 Mental Health Commission study estimates that mental illness costs the Canadian economy $50 billion a year in lost productivity and puts a strain on the overall health care system. "We know therapy is effective in improving recovery from depression, and, in some studies, it's shown to be as effective as antidepressants," says Dr. Catherine Zahn, president and CEO of the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health in Toronto. "But people don't necessarily know these treatments work."

Nor is it widely recognized just how critical good mental health is to physical well-being. A 2008 CMHA report found that people living with a serious mental illness are at a higher risk of developing a whole host of chronic physical conditions. As the World Health Organization framed it in a statement last year, "There is no health without mental health." And yet the system remains overwhelmingly weighted toward dealing with people in crisis, Smith says. "We don't wait until stage 4 cancer before we start to intervene," he notes. "So why do we do that with mental health?" Zahn agrees: "Early intervention can prevent bigger problems down the line."

In recent years, advocates have launched campaigns to help break down issues of stigma; now they're turning toward access, wanting to widen the scope of funded care. And slowly, but surely, there are signs of a shift. "Therapy is not a frill," says Zahn. "In the same way we have covered other interventions for non-psychiatric illnesses, therapy should be covered as well."

orporations are slowing waking up to the idea that fostering mental health results in a more productive, less absent, workforce. JM Lavoie, assistant vicepresident of Sun Life Financial's group benefits product development team, notes that some employers are increasing the amount of therapy covered per year, for a broader range of treatment. (Most basic plans process claims only from a psychologist or social worker.)

And in October, Starbucks Canada made headlines for announcing it will cover $5,000 of therapy each year for full-time employees-up from $400. The company was widely lauded for supporting the mental well-being of its employees. But to Smith, it was a reminder of how the system has failed. "While that's a good news story, it's an extremely damning assessment of our universal health care system," he says.

Over the past year, Smith, Zahn and their colleagues at the Mental Health Commission of Canada have been lobbying the federal government to include publicly funded psychotherapy in Canada's new Health Accord, which is due to be announced in the first half of the year. And in an open letter addressed to provincial health ministers in November, Zahn, Smith and Mental Health Commission of Canada president and CEO Louise Bradley said that while every province has a mental health strategy, "the time for strategies is long goneit's time for action." They want targeted mental health funding tied to measurable outcomes. They want investment in prevention and access to early intervention. And they are pushing for a commitment to publicly funded "structured psychotherapy," which includes cognitive-behavioural therapy, proven to be particularly helpful to people suffering from depression or anxiety. "Without an infusion of new dollars, help for mental illness will remain a privilege, well outside the grasp of some of the most vulnerable populations," the letter reads.

Zahn, who's been at the forefront of this battle for years, says she's encouraged by the response. "The signals we're getting are that this is something they're seriously thinking about." Federal Health Minister Jane Philpott has said she is "very committed" to improving mental health care for Canadians.

For those fighting for change, it can't come soon enough: Canada lags behind other developed countries, with only 7 percent of federal health care funding dedicated to mental health. "We're about a decade behind other countries like Britain, Australia, Japan and Scandinavia" when it comes to providing publicly funded psychotherapy, says Dr. Saadia Hameed, a general practitioner in London, Ont., and an assistant professor at Western University, who also researches access to psychotherapy. In Canada, Quebec is farther along than any other province in studying the issue. A 2015 report from an independent science-based health agency, the Institut national d'excellence en santé et en services sociaux, concluded that therapy is as effective as prescription drugs in treating depression and anxiety, and can even keep people from relapsing. But the government hasn't vet rolled out a plan, likely because of the hefty price tag, says Rita Cavaliere of the Montreal-based group Coalition for Access to Psychotherapy. She says it would take an investment of at least $200 million to get a program like this off the ground in Quebec...

In addition to publicly funded care, access could be improved by adding psychotherapists, social workers, psychologists or counsellors trained in psychotherapy to pre-existing family health teams, says Hameed. "Individuals who have the experience of mental illness, despite all the advances through various anti-stigma campaigns, are still concerned about prejudice and discrimination they might bear if [their condition] were known," Zahn adds.

It's hard enough for a person to acknowledge he or she might benefit from help. But as this stigma against mental health conditions begins to wane, it's important to have an accessible system in place. "It's not like we don't know what we need to do," Smith says. "We know what we need. Now we need to offer it in our health care system."

COUPLES THERAPY

You're both to blame.

"Couples can get caught in negative interactional patterns. Any move a person makes in stressful times in their relationship shapes their partner's context. It's about getting that conflict to decrease. helping patients tune in to how they feel, deep down, in moments of disconnection, and building up a more caring response."

PSYCHODYNAMIC THERAPY

Your childhood is to blame.

"The most basic things we learn in our lives. happen early on and can carry into our adult lives. Usually the reasons for our current behaviour are not conscious. The psychodynamic approach tries to figure out the past behind the present."

"CBT is a form of talk therapy that includes tracking moods and behavioural components - so instead of staying home with your head under the covers, you're purposely going outside, exercising, socializing or doing anything you know naturally helps to improve your outlook."

THE DETAILED. NOT ENTIRELY MOROSE STORY OF WHY I WILL BE IN THERAPY FOR THE REST OF MY LIFE

BY KATIE UNDERWOOD

Winston Churchill famously described depression as "a black dog" that followed him wherever he went. Sarah Silverman, a public figure more my speed, likened the feeling to constant homesickness, "but I'm home." I-a non-famous neurotic-have never felt similarly compelled to search for a poetic sentiment to capture the blistering, tamped-down anxiety I have felt more often than not, going back to first grade. It didn't feel worth talking about.

And then I found myself in the ER, convulsing in a small, windowless room. I was there because I wanted to die. I thought about writing that another way-or couching it in an oblique metaphor. But there are few feelings less subtle than the sensation that you can no longer imitate a person who is "fine," or one who likes herself and imagines a future after age 25.

The antecedents to my nervous breakdown aren't particularly novel or exciting (a spirited mix of genetics, parental divorce, English repression and codependency), but one day, the full weight of all that baggage washed over me like a white-hot dread. I no longer trusted myself. My friend met me in the hospital and held my hand until my turn came. She set me up on her couch when-after shocking myself with a command performance as a functioning adult—the attending doctor cleared me for release.

In the ensuing weeks, I found the woman I'd soon cheekily refer to as my "spirit guide" on a therapist database. Sure, she used the word journey too many times for my liking, but narrowly evading suicide left me too exhausted to nitpick.

Anne was a sweet-voiced pixie-woman armed with a giant traveller of herbal tea and an impossibly large scarf. She asked me to draw my immediate family, then scrutinized the relative distance between Cartoon Me and my Cartoon Dad. To say I was skeptical is an understatement. How was Anne going to shoulder my massive psychic burden when she looked to be drowning in her very own knitwear?

One of the fundamental misunderstandings of therapy is that a perfect stranger is going to somehow Rubik's Cube your life into something worth living. I learned, painstakingly, that the patient does the heavy lifting: I heave-cried my way through repeated simulated conversations with my inner child. I off-loadeded my grievances, big and small, into what Anne called the "Magic Box." I armycrawled through the muck. Six months in, I could finally articulate the doubts that plagued me. I don't know how I should feel. I don't know how to let myself be loved. I don't know how to let myself be at all. In those brutal hours, life began to look like something I might be interested in trying again.

I'm better, but I'm not "cured." I sometimes feel that familiar twinge-the onset of panic; the worry that I'm not enough. The difference is, now I know that "being okay" is the work of my life. So I will continue to email Anne. I will throw $125 into the ether. I will ready my itemized list of issues to place in the Magic Box. I will ask for a 7:30 p.m. time slot.

How to say 'I'm done here'

"Don't just stop going to therapy. Say to your therapist, 'I'm feeling good, my life is better now, so it's time for me to put energy into something else.' I like to review where we've been and how that's felt, what was helpful and not helpful, and do a debrief of the journey. That feels like a successful way to bring it to a close."

The doctor said, "You don't have a uterus"

Chloe* was 22 years old when she was diagnosed with MRKH syndrome. She finally understood why she never got her period, and was forced to contemplate the future. Years later, she reflects on the effect it's had on her life was 16 and hadn't yet started my period. When I told this to my doctor, he referred me to a gynecologist, who sent me for an ultrasound-but I never went back for the follow-up appointment and the doctor never called. My mom was unaware of all of it, so she wasn't asking me how it turned out. I just put the whole thing out of my mind. Instead of acknowledging that it was potentially this big. scary thing, it was easier to tell myself, "No, this is awesome-I'm just a lucky person who doesn't have a period. I don't have to buy tampons!"

As told to KALLI ANDERSON Photography REYNARD LI

I had a very conservative upbringing and, at the time, I wasn't having sex. This continued through university, so it was easy to never think about why I wasn't having a period and to ignore anything to do with my vagina.

When I was 22, I went back to my hometown and saw my old doctor, who looked through my chart, with the results of that first ultrasound I'd had at 16, and casually said, "Oh, right. You don't have a uterus." He assumed I knew. I was freaked out, but I just let it pass and didn't say anything. I didn't want to make the doctor feel bad. It felt easier to just pretend that I was in the know.

I went to see a gynecologist who did a pelvic exam and found that I also have almost no vaginal canal-it's only about a centimetre and a half long. She diagnosed me with Mayer-Rokitansky-Kuster-Hauser syndrome, otherwise known as MRKH (meaning the uterus and/or vaginal canal is either absent or underdeveloped). About one in every 5,000 female babies is born with MRKH. The gynecologist had never seen a case in person. She was so excited, she actually clapped her hands. I just lay there, traumatized.

I went to a specialist who confirmed the diagnosis and told me that with the uterus, there's basically nothing they can do. There have been some experimental uterine transplants, but the first one in the United States was performed only this year, and it's never been done in Canada. I have ovaries and eggs, so if I end up wanting a biological child, surrogacy could be an option, if I can afford it.

Since my diagnosis a few years ago, I haven't told many people-only a couple of close friends. Even my roommate doesn't know. It just rarely seems like a good time to bring it up. But it's hard because, among women, uteruses and periods come up more than you'd think. I feel like I missed out on a lot of those female bonding moments. I didn't have those "firsts" or common experiences—getting your period, having sex for the first time, a pregnancy scare. Cramps, bloating, it's all lost on me. And I don't know what to say in those conversations. I generally just nod along.

It's like when you're young and your friends are kissing boys for the first time and you don't want them to know you haven't done that yet. You don't want to fabricate a whole story, but you want to make it seem like you know what they're talking about. It's like that for me every day in what should be really normal conversations with friends. And then there's this guilt, because I feel like I'm lying to people all the time.

Women with MRKH can opt for surgery to build a vagina using other tissue, but some doctors recommend trying dilation first. They give you these graduated sizes of, essentially, hard plastic dildos to help stretch your vagina. For some people, it takes a few months of daily stretching. For others, it takes years.

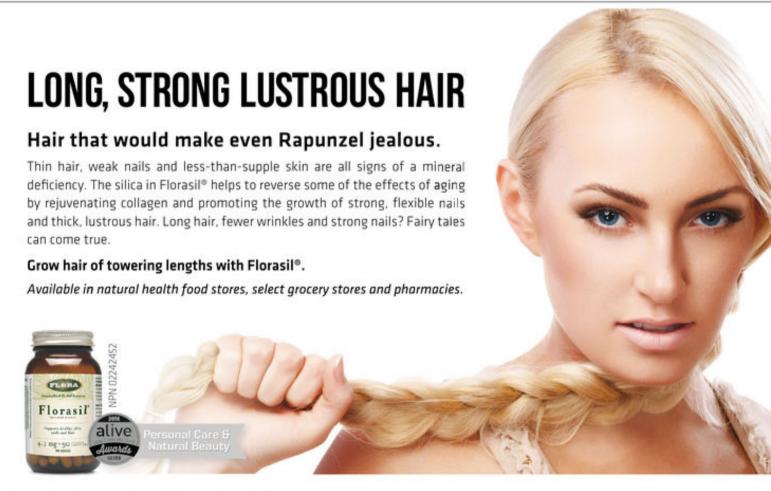

When my doctor first gave me the dilators, I just put them away and ignored them, since I still wasn't sexually active. I just didn't feel ready. But I recently started trying them for 20 minutes every day. At the beginning, it was really painful, like a burning sensation. It hurts less each time, but it's emotionally draining. I resent that I have to do it. It makes me angry that I have to build this normal, private part of my own body.

The dilation process is hard to talk about with anyone. It's a big struggle in my life right now, but it's weird to say, "So, yeah, it really sucks because I'm so tired, but I have to go sit for half an hour and try to stretch out my vagina." It feels so isolating. But I'd like to get to a point where it isn't obvious to a future partner that my vagina is any different.

I've let go of my more rigid conservative beliefs, and I've gone on a few dates in the past couple of years, but never on a second date, partly because I don't know what I would do if I started dating someone and it was progressing physically.

At what point do I bring this up? There's no rule book for how to tell someone about this. And I have the dual issue of being a virgin well into my 20s, which is awkward enough on its own, and dealing with this other question: Physically, how is this going to work?

Lots of people can't have biological kids. I know I'm not alone in that. But I just want to be able to date casually. I want to feel normal, and I think dating will be a big part of that.

ast year, Chatelaine asked 1,000 Canadian women on both sides of 40 a bunch of nosy questions - about love, romance, work, health, money and ambition. It was pretty revealing stuff, but this time around, we wanted to dig a little deeper. So we gathered slightly more of you - 1,029 women, to be exact - and asked about your sex drive and covert spending. We wanted to know what made you feel super-stressed as a partner and super-guilty as a parent. We poked into your fantasies (the racy ones and the burn-this-jobto-the-ground ones). We even asked about pimple popping.

We'll be honest: A few of our eyebrows shot up at the results. Come on, nearly half of you have never faked an orgasm? Ninety percent of you wash your bras every week? David Coletto, CEO of Abacus Data, the polling firm we recruited, says that a bit of fudging is to be expected, even in an anonymous survey - and that mostly, when we're lying, we're lying to ourselves. "There are certain expectations that society has, especially around personal hygiene," he says. "And no one likes admitting not following that to a T."

Other answers felt right on the money: that we endlessly compare our bodies with those of women we know; that we have plenty of judgment for how people raise their children; that we fret a ton about getting older but refuse to lie about our age. "That's the value of doing this research," Coletto says. "We all engage in this behaviour, but it's interesting to see the extent to which others do it as well." Not only interesting - it's comforting too. So for a very intimate (and pretty reassuring) glimpse of life at 40ish, read on. →

The basics

What's your relationship status?

What's your employment status?

3. Where do you live?

CHAPTER 1 Sex & love

IN BRIEF » 75% are still attracted to their partners

67% have kids / 14% have been divorced

60 percent of women in relationships fantasize about being single again. And 26 percent say that in the past year, they've been attracted to someone other than their partner.

51 percent of single women love the freedom and 29 percent love the solitude. But 21 percent often feel like their lives are on hold.

40 percent have sex at least once a week.

THE NITTY-GRITTY

Once a day	4%
A few times a week	18%
Once a week	18%
At least once a month	27%
Every few months	12%
Once a year	5%
Not at all	16%

BUT 41 percent suspect other couples have more sex than they do.

AND 63 percent report a mismatched sex drive in their relationships. Of them, 71 percent want less sex than their partner.

WE ASK

Does a woman's sex drive naturally wane?

66 It is not the case that those experiencing a lack of interest are all menopausal women, In fact, there's some data that shows it's less a problem for older women than for younger women, who are busy being a parent, working, volunteering in the community, multi-tasking. But I'm always struck by what people perceive as 'normal' in terms of frequency. In reality, people are not making poor-quality sex happen four times a week."

39 percent have watched pornography to spice up their sex lives. The most popular strategies for spiciness: lingerie (49 percent) and sex toys (48 percent).

> OTHER STRATEGIES → getting busy in unusual places; role-playing; threesomes; BDSM; swinging; and making a sex tape (ladies, don't upload that to the cloud).

8UT 41 percent never, ever watch porn. And 63 percent aren't convinced it's morally acceptable to do so.

40 percent of women say having kids diminished the amount of sex they have. 13 percent said having kids killed their sex lives altogether.

25 percent say they've cheated on a partner. And 76 percent of them kept that bit of information to themselves.

WE ASK

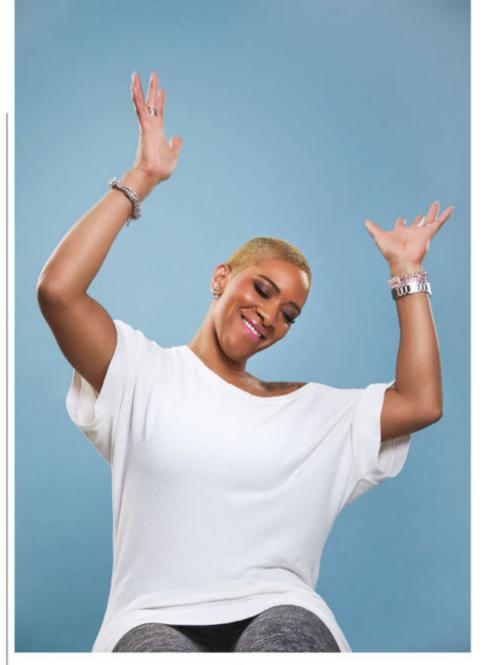

Should we fess up to an affair?

66 The majority of couples who have experienced affairs stay together. But some of them will merely survive, and others will be able to turn a crisis into an opportunity-they'll be able to turn this into a generative experience.... Now that the affair is exposed, [the deceived partners] no longer have to uphold the status quo that may not have been working for them that well either. I've noticed that a lot of couples in the immediate aftermath of an affair-because of this new disorder that may lead to a new order-will have depths of conversations with honesty and openness that they haven't had in decades. Partners who were sexually indifferent find themselves suddenly

53 percent of women have faked an orgasm. (Yes, that means 47 percent say they've never faked one. Yes, we were suspicious, too.)

SO WE ASKED.

Are we really becoming less likely to fake it?

66 As we've become more open about women's pleasure, we've also started to think of a woman's orgasm as the natural end of a sexual encounter. But in many cases, satisfaction and orgasm are not the same thing: Women report feeling perfectly satisfied with the sex they've had even without an orgasm. As we get more comfortable with the idea that satisfaction takes many forms, there might not be as much pressure on women to have an orgasm, and so they won't feel like they need to fake it in order to make their partners feel good or bring an end to the encounter."

55 percent of women masturbate at least once a month. 23 percent of them don't masturbate at all.

Is marriage forever? 70 percent of women say yes; 30 percent of them think it's for "the foreseeable future."

WEASH

Do we care all that much about marriage anymore?

Few celebrity sound bites have drawn more ire than "conscious uncoupling," that New Agey term Gwyneth Paltrow used to frame her 2014 split from Chris Martin. Even Paltrow later rejected the divorce mantra as "goofy." But her emphasis on enlightened co-parenting spoke to a broader cultural pivot toward friendly divorce for the sake of the modern family's star players: kids.

The role of children as tiny, soccer-practising overlords is a relatively new phenomenon-for eons, they were treated more like chattel, at least until turn-of-the-20th-century child-labour laws put an end to that racket. "Kids became these vulnerable, priceless creatures rather than economic assets in the family." said Jennifer Senior, author of 2014's All Joy and No Fun: The Paradox of Modern Parenthood, to NPR host Terry Gross in February 2014. "And ever since then, steadily and surely, they have become these exalted creatures at the centre of our lives."

It's an exaltation we once reserved for marriage, a rite that conveniently used to max out with our 50-year lifespans. But this is an age when Canada's divorce rate is nearly a coin toss (41 percent), and Chatelaine's own results reveal that a healthy share of women surveyed view the marriage contract as for now, not forever. So who are we to judge when a marriage ends? Well, increasingly, we aren't: 86 percent of respondents say they rarely or never scorn people who get divorced. And more and more, the institution itself isn't considered a necessary precursor to children: 89 percent of our respondents rarely or never judge parents who have kids out of wedlock.

Not much lasts forever, so it makes sense that parenting can now exist separately from marriage. Our kids remain, as Senior puts it, "the last binding obligation in a culture that asks for almost no other permanent commitments at all."—Katie Underwood

BUT WE GOTTA ASK

Is it okay to objectify our prime minister?

this sense that it's our turn to objectify people, because we're so used to being objectified all the time. But if I were to put on my social justice hat, I would probably say, No, I don't think it's really great that we objectify him. But then there's another part of me that says, Hey, we have a prime minister who's nice to look at. So that's a challenging question."—Samantha, 36

CHAPTER 2 Home & work

IN BRIEF > 56% have a college or university degree

41% comb through their bills carefully / 61% own a house

Half of women feel ashamed about the amount of screen time their kids get. 20 percent worry they give their children too much sugar, and 21 percent stress about the amount of fast food.

42 percent have bought something and hid it from their partner.

Why do you do that?

66 I started lying about my shopping habits in my 20s, after I got married and my money became 'our' money. I don't care about spending, whereas he's always worried about that rainy day. It's caused problems. But I love shoes. When my husband would ask me about the $100 charge coming in from Nine West every week, I told him I was taking clients out to lunch. I managed to pass off the store as a restaurant for three years, until someone at work joked in front of him about Nine West's fillet of sole. I had to come clean. My husband wasn't overly happy. I still buy shoes, but I don't wear a lot of them in front of him. I probably have 15 pairs that I hide at work." - Jo-Anne, 45

IN FACT 83 percent say money causes tension in their relationship, and for 39 percent, money is the greatest source of stress.

WEASK

Can we get better at dealing with our money hang-ups?

No one likes talking about money: It can feel tacky and taboo, even in the comfort of a long-term relationship. Or maybe especially in the comfort of a long-term relationship, since more than a quarter of the women in our survey regularly lie to their partners about their finances.

Love and cash are such a fraught combination, in fact, that a 2013 Kansas State University study of more than 4,500 couples pinpointed arguments over money as by far the top predictor of divorce-yep, even more than fights about sex or inlaws. That was true regardless of income level; money brawls also lasted longer and included "harsher language" than other ones. No surprise, then, that 39 percent of our respondents say that money is the greatest source of stress in their relationship, causing significantly more conflict than sex, parenting, 59% of the women in our photo shoot have been kept up at night by worries about money and work. division of household labour or finding quality time together.

How can couples foster healthy relationship habits around cash? For starters, abandon the idea that one of you "sucks with money," says Shannon Simmons, a Toronto-based financial planner. That's toxic rhetoric that she says absolves heavy spenders of responsibility and saddles their sweeties with all the money woes. And you'll need to divulge your respective financial histories. "Go over what you each make immediately," she says. "Like numerical details-is it $50,000 or $60,000? And do you get a bonus?" Be real about budgeting habits, financial goals and debt (especially the credit card kind), since "you need to make sure you're on the same financial wavelength." If all else fails, go the mediation route: Simmons says that hiring a third-party financial planner can "take the heat off."

Yes, unpacking your financial hang-ups sucks, but even in an age of separate chequing accounts, money issues should be among religious beliefs and weird sexual preferences in the canon of Things Couples Speak Frankly about Whether They Like It or Not. The alternative - keeping personal-finance matters too personal - signals a gross lack of trust. And that's relationship suicide.

54 percent fantasize about quitting their jobs at least once a month. 16 percent fantasize about walking out every day.

When are you just overwhelmed - and when do you really need to quit?

66 I've seen a lot of women experience what I call career chafe, which is when your health is being eroded, your relationships suffer and there's a real decline in your self-confidence. If your job doesn't provide you with regular evidence of how awesome you are, it's time to find another one. But we can all have those Sundaynight dreads. And our fantasies about quitting hold important clues about what career improvements we need. If you fantasize about being your own boss, what's the attraction there? But, number 1, you don't know how much of that is real. And, number 2, it may distract you from appreciating other ways of showing love - someone fixing the garbage disposal, or getting winter tires for the car. Sure, it's not a Hallmark moment. 52 percent of women feel they need to lose at least 20 pounds.

AND 51 percent occasionally compare their bodies with the bodies of women they know. 34 percent do it constantly.

WE NEED TO ASK

How can we stop this, already?

66 There's this false perception that somehow, as women age, they grow out of their body-image issues," says Dr. Shelly Russell-Mayhew, counselling psychologist and associate professor at the University of Calgary. There's no age limit to feeling terrible about the skin we live in-and not just when some hot young thing is strutting around in a commercial, but because your best friend got a facial and eight straight hours of sleep and she looks amazing. When we size ourselves up against other women, we're engaging in something called social comparison theory, determining our self-worth based on the vardstick of someone else's attractiveness or wealth or success. There's no objective measurement here; it's all in our heads.

But here's the thing: Our heads can also get us out of this mess, since when it comes to mental well-being, believing yourself to be fat is more harmful than actual obesity. "Weight is just your relationship with gravity," Russell-Mayhew says. "There are more important measures of physical health, like your blood profile or lipids. And in a number of studies, when people say, 'I think my size is just right,' regardless of weight status, they have better psychological health." So instead of spending a bunch of energy wishing for slim hips like Susan's in accounting, channel that energy into doing something that makes you feel good, like afterwork yoga or eating a doughnut just because you want to. Can self-diagnosis still do the trick?

66 Compared with five or 10 years ago, there are so many credible online resources now for people to selfmanage mental health, especially with mild to moderate symptoms. We can detect changes in our own moods, and self-care approaches a solid diet, or hobbies we like-are often our first lines of defence. We're absolutely our own experts; we know ourselves best. But we're not the most objective experts. And if the symptoms become severe, that's when we need the assistance of a professional. My clients are smart, educated women, but I see many of them say, 'I thought I was

Methodology

Our survey was conducted online with 1,029 women between 35 and 45 in Canada, August 19-22, 2016. A random sample of panellists were invited to complete the survey from a large representative panel of Canadians, recruited and managed by Research Now, one of the world's leading providers of online research samples.

The Marketing Research and Intelligence Association policy limits statements about margins of sampling error for most online surveys. The margin of error for a comparable probability-based random sample of the same size is +/- 3.1%, 19 times out of 20, for each province's sample. The data were weighted according to census data to ensure that the sample matched Canada's according to age, gender, educational attainment and region. Totals may not add up to 100 due to rounding.

TIPS FOR USING AN

IMMERSION BLENDER

An immersion blender is a great shortcut for achieving super-creamy soup. It drops right into the soup pot (no need to transfer hot soup to a blender), is easy to clean and takes up very little cupboard space

Remove pot of soup from heat.

Place pot in an empty sink, so you can see what you're doing and contain any splatter.

Drop head of immersion blender right into the soup before you turn it on (again to contain splatter and avoid burns), then slowly move blender around the pot in circular motions until mixture is smooth.

To clean, detach the head and swish it around in a sudsy sink.

My friends wondered what I was doing differently...

I LOST 65 POUNDS WITH ZUCCARIN DIET

y name is Josephine and I live in Toronto. I work as a nutritional planner for hospital patients. All my life I have struggled with my weight but over the last year I have finally figured it out. I am down 65 pounds now and feeling better than ever. My friends and my aqua fitness instructor keep asking me what I am up to and how I lost so much weight.

I READ ABOUT ZUCCARIN

A few years back I was told my blood sugar was too high. I was tired, craving sugar and not losing weight, so the diagnosis didn't come as a surprise. My doctor wanted to start me on medications, but I wanted to try a natural option first.

I read about a woman in Florida who had regulated her blood sugar levels naturally and while doing that, lost a big amount of weight. She had been using a mulberry leaf supplement called Zuccarin.

MY WEIGHT LOSS SUCCESS

When I started using Zuccarin I first noticed that my blood sugar dropped to normal levels within days. It was great to see that result from a natural health product.

After a while I noticed how much better I felt and how my sugar cravings were fading. As a nice side effect, I was gradually losing weight, and noticing how my waist was shrinking. I was thrilled!

Now it has been over a year, and I have lost 65 pounds in total. Zuccarin has been a huge help in reducing my sugar cravings and weight. Now, when anyone asks me how I did it, I am the first to tell them about Zuccarin. I strongly recommend it to anyone who has blood sugar - or weight issues, as I had."

The times The Gulf War ended in a ceasefire, Canada's GST came into effect and Margaret Atwood released Wilderness Tips, a short story collection. The seduction tool Perfume. Whether you prefer powdery spritzes, heady musks or freshly baked goods, as Chatelaine writer Charmaine Gooden pointed out in 1991, "a signature fragrance may well be romance's most artful ally." Gooden asked eight lovey-dovey couples about the scents that bonded them. There was Jordan, who chose perfume for his wife, Susan ("I like to smell it when I embrace her"); Lily, an Opium wearer, whose classic floral scent reminded her husband, Anthony, "she's home"; and Eric, who said a noseful of the spicy Sonia Rykiel eau de toilette worn by his wife, Margaretha, evoked memories of a boat trip off the coast of Florida's Cocoa Beach. "The sky was full of stars, and we were sneaking away." Sniff, sniff. - Katie Underwood
